

1. Executive summary

This analysis looked at foreign funding to UVA to increase its funding. UVA received about 22 million from 98 foreign gifts. UVA received more than the median but less than the overall average. The results show that UVA could increase foreign funding by building more international relationships and focusing on countries that already give pretty large amounts to similar universities.

2. Overall giving and giving to UVA

Qatar gave the most money overall with almost 2.7 billion, but England had the most gifts at 3,655. Carnegie Mellon University received 1.48 billion. The largest amount from one country to a single university was Qatar to Cornell University 1 billion. UVA received 22 million from 98 foreign gifts. The average of UVA gifts was 226,421, and the median was about 80,536. Compared to the selected peer universities, UVA received the least foreign funding. Duke received about 343.7 million. Berkeley received 294.5 million, Michigan 287.3 million, and UNC received 41.3 million. This shows that UVA has plenty of room to grow and get funding.

3. Strategy for finding new funding

UVA should focus on countries that already give out large amounts of money to similar US universities but give very little or nothing to UVA. China was the largest opportunity at 70.9 million, followed by Canada at 43.7 million, Kazakhstan and Germany at about 43.5 million each, and Hong Kong at 37.8 million. UVA should focus on those countries and look at the donors and organizations that support its peer universities.

4. Overall I think UVA has a good opportunity to gain foreign funding. UVA does receive more money than many other universities, but it is doing lower than the selected peer university. Reaching out to more international donors and looking into countries that already support its peer university would allow UVA the opportunity to increase its foreign funding.
